Southern-fried censorship

Last week's Osceola ran an item discussing The State newspaper's removal of a comic strip because a handful of readers found it unpalatable to their prejudices. Nothing unusual here. The only surprise is that The State ever published the strip in the first place. What hot-brained editor had so flaunted the Code of the South as to approve for mass publication a piece of social criticism and, worse, satire? Now he's retreated to the limpid venality which is that newspaper's permanent standard.

And so it goes with all the state's mass media. Every news executive in South Carolina keeps fierce vigilance, lest an actual idea sneak past his guard. The rule is to suppress any thought which might conceivably disturb the ignorant ruminations of the most halfwitted clod who ever whooped for Strom Thurmond and clicked his heels on the day when JFK was killed. (On that morning I was standing in formation on my barracks quadrangle at The Citadel; as the news came in, there was scattered applause; thick Southern accents mumbled that "he got what he deserved, damned nigger-lover".)

And if every editorial writer and TV reporter in the state asks himself "would Lester Maddox have said it this way" before he pronounces his handiwork ready for dissemination to the populace, it's argued that, well, this is Conservatism at work, and the South is Conservative. But an appeal to facts will quickly show that the kind of authoritarian censorship practiced as a matter of course by the state's newspeople is antithetical to true Conservatism.

Edmund Burke, the father of Conservatism, roundly blasted all forms of totalitarianism. And modern Conservatives such as Russell Kirk and William F. Buckley, Jr. look on it as mere imbecility (interestingly, a few years ago. The State cancelled Buckley's column, since it failed to conform to the desired first-grade mentality--do I insult first-graders? Then make it "mulish" mentality; mules won't argue).

> "...Yes, if the South is fertile ground for the artist, it is because the artist is a rebel by nature, and the South gives him so much to rebel against. The very proof of the pudding is that only in the North have Southern writers attained stature..."

I was once, long ago, privy to the sagacity of a diddering editor in charge of one of Charleston's dailies. He spoke with a grin on his face, and in whispered tones, of how all the news executives of the city had gathered in secret union during the early 1960s. They had come together to determine what should be done about "disturbances" which had occurred in the black ghettos of the city. Of course, they decided to suppress the news. The disturbances were not reported at all in the local media. Meanwhile the Charleston news executives made snickering jokes. Their favorite was some double-entendre contained in the phrase, "the jig is up" for Charleston. Cute, huh?

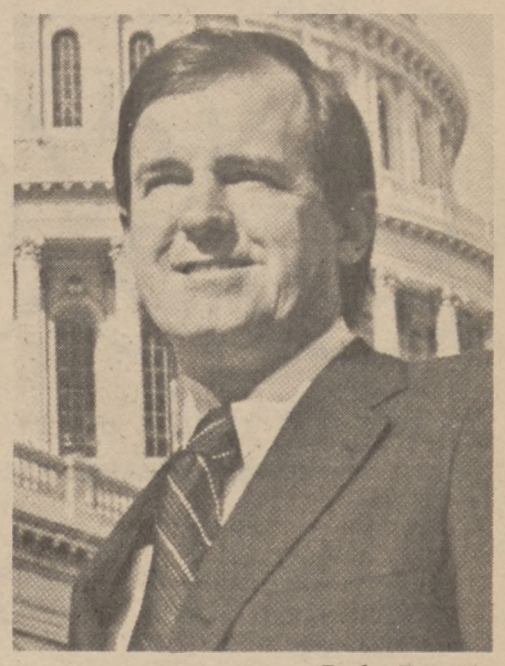
Why are Southerners so hostile to new and different ideas? Why do so many of them construct literal cocoons around their lives, to ward off the realities of the outside world? I know a couple, for instance, who go out to the back yard every evening between 6 and 7 p.m., specifically so as not to be debauched by the nightly news telecasts. I know others who go to extreme lengths so as to avoid reading anything more demanding than TV Guide. And very often when shopping, I pass by racks holding copies of this very journal. It's quite common to find copies of Osceola there ripped up, or turned so the back cover faces outward. What pathos in contemplation of intellects so weak and so angered by novel ideas, so outraged by the truth! One day I'd love to catch a glimpse of one of those people who feel compelled to meanly tear up copies of this periodical. I'd love to see what sort of humanity they represent. (Maybe they're all editors of The State.)

The myth has arisen that the South loves literature. But the truth is that it detests art, save for art that reinforces its own shoddy patriotism. Look at the book section of the local Sunday paper. Whether one examines a copy dated 1957 or 1977, he'll find the same dull reviews of books on Southern history, on Southern architecture, on the Civil War and Fundamentalist Doctrine. Only occasionally will there be mention of a significant new novel, and then the reviewer will denounce it as being full of "filthy words" or who-knows-what.

This fable of Southern affinity for literature comes from the fact that some Southerners have gotten prominence as writers. But in every case worth mentioning, the Southerners in question have been alien creatures, whose art was informed with their estrangement from the evil and the banality of their native region. Almost all the great Southern novels are eloquent and subtle attacks on the South. Witness Thomas Wolfe, William Faulkner, Tennessee Williams, and the rest-- even James Dickey. Yes, if the South is fertile ground for the artist, it is because the artist is a rebel by nature and the South gives him so much to rebel against. The very proof of the pudding is that only in the North have Southern writers attained stature. They're always studiously ignored in the South, or else they're hounded out of it.

There's a moral and intellectual price the South has paid and will go on paying for its congenital hatred of the truth. The South will continue to be ruled by men who can lie with sonorous phrases, who can bend logic in voluptuous rhetoric shaped to flatter the most vulpine instincts of Southern dogma. The South will continue to get what it deserves, and get it good and hard.

Butler bounces back



Butler Derrick

Third district congressman Butler Derrick's political troubles stemming from his opposition to the Richard B. Russell dam project may not be as serious as some observers have indicated. If you remember, Derrick--who originally supported the dam and lake project--changed his mind and took a stand against it after consulting with President Jimmy Carter. Carter was opposed to further expenditure of funds on the dam, because, he said, it would be obsolete before it was finished--and he believed it unsound environmentally.

Derrick had become the lone stranger in the South Carolina congressional delegation opposing the further funding of the project. His position placed him in direct confrontation with South Carolina's junior senator, "Fritz" Hollings, who seemed to take Derrick's opposition as a personal afront. (Hollings is said to have been the main driving force behind the project in the Senate even though S.C.'s Strom Thurmond also supported it.) Even former congressman W.J. Bryan Dorn, the man Derrick replaced in the third district, got into the act at one point, threatening to run against Derrick should he continue to oppose the dam. In addition, congressman John Jenrette, whose fifth district lies about as far away as you can get from the project, put his two cents in to support the dam,

After Derrick made his decision to oppose the dam late last May, political observers were saying he had committed political suicide by opposing a district project slated to bring jobs and money to his constituents. Even Derrick's staff expressed doubts about his political future. On the plus side, however, news reports began to filter back from Washington that made Derrick look pretty good; he was making headway in Congress in the effort to stop pork barrel water projects and the President wasn't likely to forget Derrick's show of courage and his assistance in the House.

But the pressure from the pork-prone politicians on Capitol Hill was just too great. In a decision dripping with political pragmatism, Carter decided to avoid a Congressional showdown and sought a "compromise" instead. He would not veto the public works bill containing appropriations for Russell Dam and eight other water projects if Congress would delete funding for nine others and, most importantly, remove funds for the Clinch River breeder reactor project.

Derrick had gone to the line for Carter, and Carter had deserted him. A victory on the dam issue, some political observers felt, would boost Derrick's image in the Third District. What would Carter's desertion do?

Not much apparently. A recent poll, conducted by Survey Research Company of Lugoff at Derrick's expense, shows that Derrick has a 71.5 percent approval rating from his constituents, in spite of the fact that he opposed the Russell dam. The scientific poll, conducted in late July, also showed that 36 percent of Derrick's constituents in the 10-county district agreed with his opposition to the dam, while an equal number (36 percent) were for it. The other 28 percent don't care.

Derrick's had some other good news recently. A report in last Tuesday's (August 9th) Wall Street Journal indicated that Carter would ask Congress to defer spending for the Russell dam, apparently in deference to Derrick. That was in spite of the fact that he signed the public works bill which would provide funding for the project only a day earlier. Just before he signed the bill, Carter told S.C. newsmen that "I don't think Russell Dam ought ever to be built, and I will do what I can to stop it. Whether I veto it this year, I can't tell you. But if I don't, I will be trying to prevent it being built next year. I think it's a waste of money." Then Carter signed away another 10.2 million dollars towards completion of the project.

White House spokesmen have refused to confirm or deny the Wall Street Journal report, but even if it is true, Congress is not likely to heed the President's request since both houses have already mustered enough votes to pass the funds for the project. Only a presidential veto--what Derrick was counting on--could have prevented funding for the project this year.

But in spite of Carter's attempt to "make up" with Derrick--consolation Derrick is not likely to accept-- it appears that Derrick's courageous stand on the Russell Dam has not hurt him near as much as some observers were predicting. Derrick may have learned a lesson about political dealings with the knife Carter gave him in the back, but he may also have learned that voters like and support politicians who stand up for what they believe, regardless of whether the voters agree.

Roastin' Massa Tom

The 'roast' of Richland County Treasurer Tom Elliott, which took place last Thursday night at the Knights of Columbus Hall here in town, was the kind of occasion that illuminates whole unseen portions of the personalities of some of the most prominent political figures in the county, but it is the kind of affair that the ordinary citizen rarely attends or hears about.

The occasion was an effort by Richland County Demo party chairman Dennis Bolt to raise some money for the local party without the usual expenditure for a sit-down dinner, and at the same time "have some fun by roasting the perfect victim," Tom Elliot. He may indeed be the "perfect victim." His reputation as a political power-broker provided the source for an enormous number of the jokes told that night, along with some of the most incredibly tasteless and juvenile humor imaginable.

Seven well-known Columbia attorneys took the podium to tell the assembled crowd of around 300 relatives, friends and enemies what they thought about 'ole massa Tom' (Rep. Kay Patterson's words). State senators Alex Sanders and Isadore Lourie led the field and proved to be rather witty.

Sanders has an especially good feel for timing and his wit lies as much in his droll, sly delivery as in the actual words. The former lieutenant gubernatorial candidate greeted the audience and members of the head table, including Brantley harvey (who defeated him) by referring to the only two occasions upon which he and Harvey had disagreed. "The first was settled by a vote of the people...the bastards. And the second was when Brantley told me to say good things about Tom Elliott tonight."

Lourie is also funny, with some lines about being Jewish and playing basketball. But it remained for House members I.S. Leevy Johnson, and Kay Patterson, both black and former County council candidate Dr. Frank Harrison to slowly slide into the lower depths of idiot humor.

Rep. Johnson was really not too bad (he resembles a pudgy Flip Wilson) and some of his lines were funny, but Kay Patterson, who continued to refer to Elliott as 'massa Tom', told some bizarre stories about "slop jars" and a joke about two snakes who didn't have a "pit to hiss in". Both Johnson and Patterson made jesting references to Elliott's liquor and bathroom habits, and Dr. Harrison added several more including a long, disjointed (by now most people were somewhat inebriated) story about a trip to Jamaica and "tits and nipples." It was very strange.

Columbia attorney Jerry Screen (also black) finished with some fast one-liners covering Elliott himself ("a real lard-ass"). Governor Edwards ("his plane is being held in Uganda and Don Fowler is negotiating his release") and Elliott's heritage ("Tom is Rev. Whitaker's half-brother." Whitaker is a prominent black Columbian and Democratic Party stalwart). And he summed up every other roaster's comments on Elliott's political machinations by saying, "We haven't caught him yet."

Elliott's reply to all this was delivered to each roaster, and he even had something to say about those who didn't attend. He. began by commenting (to roars of laughter) "I don't like a whole lot of you. In fact a lot of you piss me off." Then he proceeded to tell a story about himself and a Republican poll watcher in Garner's precinct during a past election. It seems the presence of the GOPper was depressing the number of votes cast there so Elliott, who was at another precinct, called the GOP representative and asked how many people had voted in Garners. When the poll watcher replied, "only 10 or 15," Elliott told him he'd better "get on over to Gadsden precinct right away; they're voting all kinds of people over here." The dumb guy went, and by the time he got back to Garners, "we'd voted 290 people," Elliott laughed, "and there's only 230 registered in the whole damn precinct!"

It was the kind of occasion where the easily understandable humor was usually crude, and the more subtle laughs required an understanding of Elliott's role in county politics over the last 15 years. There were dozens of 'inside' jokes about "gas money" and "Gadsden precinct;" and if you didn't know the lingo much of it was confusing. And even knowing the language didn't necessarily make it funny. Elliott is the closest Columbia comes to figures like Chicago's mayor Daley. He is colorful, bawdy and probably one of the most powerful political figures remaining in county politics. God help us.

One figure who obviously had a good time was that old Dixiecrat himself, Sen. Strom Thurmond, who explained his presence by saying, "he (Elliott) is a good man--the people have elected him time and time again. He's the man the people vote for!" Strom recieved a very warm, standing ovation during the introduction period (which dragged on for nearly 20 minutes) and managed to shake every hand in the room. When Elliott was asked if he would vote for Thurmond or Democratic challenger Pug Ravenel, he replied, "I don't know the man (Ravenel). I haven't made up my mind." Ravenel, along with state party chairman Don Fowler and scheduled roaster Rep. Jean Toal didn't show. Alex Sanders had "one word for Strom: smart".

It was a weird evening. Watching powerful men behave like teenage boys in the high school bathroom is not pleasant, but when these same men make laws and decisions that affect your life, it adds a whole new perspective.

Dick Riley and Tom Elliott at the roast

Apostle of apartheid

By the time you read this, Governor James Edwards will have returned from his controversial trip to South Africa, where for two weeks he has extolled the virtues of apartheid on a South African government expense account, shocking not only bleeding-heart liberals like ourselves, but every politician and citizen in the state with a shred of common sense or decency.

Press aides say the governor's schedule has not been settled, and they don't know if he will hold a press conference upon arrival. If he's smart, he'll sneak in the back door and wait for things to cool down.

Not that the press is likely to let it go at that. Edwards' remarks on South African television and to the South African press to the effect that apartheid really ain't all that terrible have incited criticism from Republicans as well as Democrats, and the state's media--smelling blood--will be after the governor for some response. As they should be.

State Democratic Party chairman Don Fowler blasted Edwards last week, saying Edwards' "defense of the raw, segregationist government of South Africa" is "an insult to black citizens of our state who comprise almost one-third of our people." Edwards told reporters in Capetown that "the black influence in American politics" has kept South Africa from getting its "fair share" of sympathy in the U.S. In a strongly-worded rebuttal, Fowler said that "the fair share of sympathy for the racist, apartheid government of South Africa is exactly zero," and accused Edwards of giving "aid and comfort to those who still openly practice racism."

Of course Edwards might have figured the Democrats would get all huffy about such trifles. Just plain old partisan politics. But the criticism didn't stop there. GOP spokesmen--the racial epithets of the 50s and 60s barely dead on their lips--likewise struck out at the governor. Edwards' remarks "were totally uncalled for," former state GOP chairman Harry Dent told the AP this week. "I hate to see the impression left that this is the position of the Republican Party in South Carolina."

"The essence of Strom Thurmond's life has been political. A very real key to his success has been his ability to develop an opposition which has brought with it the mantle of credibility. By either creating or alluding to the idea that he has the right kind of enemies, Thurmond has afforded the voters an easy choice. From the 1946 gubernatioral race in which the 'Barnwell ring' was mentioned to his denunciation of the Democratic party in 1964, Thurmond has consistently used his opposition toward selected opponents with success."

--James Banks, Strom Thurmond and the Revolt against Modernity (Ph.D. Diss.), 1970

The macho of time

James Reston interrupted one of his recent Washington weather reports ("The heat's enough to melt the copper on the White House roof," etc.) to observe that Secretary of State Cyrus Vance "is putting in so many hours that he's scarcely getting the minimum wage." Reston probably thought this was pretty cute, but it demonstrated once again how far out of touch he and other Washington movers and shakers are from the life around them.

To earn his annual salary of $63,000 at the federal minimum wage of $2.30 an hour, Vance would have to work 75 hours a day, 365 days a year. (This doesn't include federal employee perks like health care and pension benefits. Nor does it reflect the fact that Secretary Vance, unlike his fellow minimum wage workers in the private sector, needn't participate in Social Security.) Working a more reasonable 24 hours a day every day for a year, Vance would earn $20,148—or, with time and a half for overtime, $27,830. This $63,000 is not a lavish amount for Mr. Vanc's job—certainly it is less than Mr. Reston makes—but it bears no serious comparison to the minimum wage.

The real point is that Cyrus Vance doesn't work 75 hours a day, or 24 or even—I suspect—12. The whole concept of working time, when applied to white-collar workers such as the Secretary of State, is degraded by exaggeration and mislabelling. The higher the status level, the greater the exaggeration. When an auto worker puts in an eight-hour day, that doesn't include commuting of lunch (not even a "working lunch") or chatting or staring out the window (because, among other reasons, there's no window). The amount of time an executive or lawyer or journalist actually spends "working" in the narrow sense used to define a blue-collar worker's wage really is quite a small. If 14 hours of work, I'd be very surprised.

Now this is simply the nature of mental as opposed to physical labor; the human brain isn't as efficient as the human body, and it can't work long hours straight. Nothing wrong with it, as long as it's admitted. But it's not nice to brag about long hours. And it's an insult to people putting in an honest eight hours of physical labor to suggest, as james Reston does, that Jimmy Carter "thinks anything less than an 18-hour work day is a sign of indolence, if not moral weakness." Nobody in Carter's employ works an 18-hour day, or anything close to it.

Carter himself, we're told, listens to classical music 10 hours a day. If he also works 18 hours, that's 28 hours right there. Of course the assumption is that he listens while he's working, which doesn't necessarily detract from the quality of his work but may well detract from the quality of his listening. But there is no classical music or any kind of music being played in the coal mines. Miners listen on their own time.

People in Washington invest large chunks of ego in the amount of time they claim to work. And there is no doubting that law offices and consulting firms around town and the upper reaches of the Federal empire are full of people at their desks late into the evening and on weekends.

To take an extreme example, a young man named David Rubenstein, a deputy to Stuart Eizenstat, Carter's assistant for domestic policy, described his life to the Washington Star a while back: "I'm a workaholic. I'm here at 7:30 in the morning, and I'm here until 11:30 at night, seven days a week. I have no free time." He lunches at the White House mess and dines out of vending machines. "I just don't have any time." This is like a parody of the typical "top administrative aide" media profile, but they all go on about early morning meetings and the packed briefcase trailing into the sunset and the loyal wife who complains, "We never seem to have any time alone anymore."

> "...Two questions naturally arise from these sagas of time macho. What could they possibly be doing for all these hours? And if all these important people are working so hard, why isn't there peace and prosperity throuthout the land?..."

During Carter's first week in office, the President implied that he was going to stop all this nonsense. You remember when he told the world he wanted his staff to spend time at home with their families. But whether it's the fault of the Carter people or the hack instincts of the press, the cliche of the public servant too valuable to the nation to do anything but "work" is as virulent as ever. Carter, Reston tells us, "gets to work by six in the morning," is "an alarming influence on his staff and Cabinet, who try to keep up with his energy," not to mention (or rather, to mention later on) "his tireless energy and relentless determination."

Two questions naturally arise from these sagas of time macho. What could they possibly be doing for all these hours? And if all these important people are working so terribly hard, why isn't there peace and prosperity throughout the land? (Or, to put it another way, what wretchedness are these long hours saving us from, if all they accomplish is the world we've got?)

A veteran observer of foolishness in high places explains Washington time macho this way: "If you can't measure output, you measure input." Since policy makers cannot often point to anything objective they've accomplished, all they can do to assure themselves and the rest of us of their value is to put in long hours.

The problem is not limited to government. Fewer and fewer of the jobs available to educated people are of the sort that can leave a person confident at the end of the day that he or she has accomplished anything. Lawyers, business executives, social workers, educational administrators: all they can do is to work long hours and hope for the best.

Muckraking in the Piedmont:

by Bennie Lee Sinclair

Those bullet holes in the front window of The Greenville County Monitor were allegedly put there by irate deputies when editor/publisher Larry Atkins was printing spirited charges against them and Sheriff Cash Williams back in early '76. Now, a year and a half, several grand jury indictments, and an election later, the sheriff and his men are out of office, but Atkins is still very much at work in his--the shattered glass a daily reminder of the perils of investigative journalism.

It's ironic that the hottest newspaper activity in this upstate county is generated by The Monitor in the miss-it-if-you-blink mountain town of Marietta, but for three years--since Atkins concentrated his local publishing efforts into the biweekly Monitor--the area's larger, Multimedia-owned dailies, The Greenville News and Greenville Piedmont, have often seemed tepid in comparison. In addition to Sheriff Williams, Atkins' targets have included the so-called "Dixie Mafia" (organized crime in the South); Multimedia's ownership of local papers, radio, and television; the county school superintendent and school board; and city, county, and town councils, to name but a few. Sight of his bright yellow, radio-equipped Volkswagon signals a story in the making. Armed with camera and tape-recorder, he tracks down hints of unfairness or illegality, especially involving use of the public's tax monies. His tips come from a variety of sources, including law enforcement officials; city, county, and state employees; and ordinary citizens. At a time when the disillusionment of journalists is a common malaise, he remains evangelically optimistic.

"If the journalists of this land would work together", he says, "we could do a lot toward protecting the public's interests. If only they would, the journalists could clean up the government in two years."

His mule-headedness in the face of "the system's" supposed insurmountability is exceeded only by his ingenuity at outwitting it. When county facilities became even more neglected in what tends to be a neglected end of the county, The Monitor published a carefully-researched and quite legal plan for the area to secede from Greenville County to form a new "Blue Ridge" County, to the delight of disgruntled citizens. Amazed Greenville County officials must have realized the political potential of the maneuver, for services improved quickly and noticeably.

Larry Atkins was born in Greenville in 1933. He attended Mountain View, a rural high school, and Holmes Theological Seminary before being ordained by the Interdenominational Christian Fellowship Church. In 1954 he married Virginia Coleman (of Hyman, S.C. in Florence County). The couple have three daughters (a son died in infancy) and a grandson. Atkins pastored the Full Gospel Church in Tuxedo, N.C. for a year, and the Bible Deliverance Temple in Marietta for seventeen years before getting into the publishing business "by accident", in 1970. "The local basketball team had won a tournament--big news to us, but not to the downtown papers", he explains, "so I printed a newsletter about it and distributed 500 copies. A local businessman offered to buy an ad if I'd print another edition of community news." The name "Community News" stuck, as the publication grew, until January 1975 when it was incorporated into The Greenville County Monitor.

Like his entry into publishing, Atkins' career as an investigative journalist began "by accident".

"It was over a 1973 campaign promise Sheriff Williams failed to keep to our community", he says, smiling at the irony. "We had a part-time deputy up here patrolling the businesses and churches around Slater-Marietta. The businessmen paid his salary. Williams came up here and promised that if we'd vote for him, he'd have two black-and-whites on duty up here all the time. Well, we helped get him elected, and let our part-time deputy up here go. I published a survey, a poll, where 100% of the people interviewed said Cash Williams had broken his promise. He denied it, but then, through a contact in his office, I got hold of a memo he'd issued to his deputies, telling them to patrol around the metropolitan area, not the rural sections like Slater-Marietta. When I published that, the war was on." That it became a battle royale, with The Monitor playing David to the sheriff's department's Goliath; and that a lot of people in public office underestimated The Monitor's eventual outreach, is now a curious part of Greeville County history that is likely to be forgotten if not recited now and then.

Though his city-based foes like to portray Atkins as a know-nothing hillbilly, he is in fact articulate, well-dressed, and mannerly. Blond and ruddy he looks younger than his 44 years. In conversation he is quick to find the "funding keys" to various complex political problems--making astute observations about the various connections and uses of tax monies. He is plainspoken, often inserting a well-chosen Biblical quote when discussing the ethics of journalism. That his reporting is a moral matter, inciting moral decisions and reactions from others, is something that is obviously much on his mind.

"As a preacher I didn't 'soften' the message for my congregation," he says, "and as an editor I don't 'soften' the news."

He is disappointed that, during his long battle with the sheriff's department, some people he thought were "strong" ended up "turning their backs or straddling the fence." Pressure from opposing forces was felt by his advertisers. One, whose business phones were kept tied up by anonymous callers, apologetically canceled his ad in The Monitor, but reinstated it as soon as the event had blown over.

"I couldn't blame him", Atkins said. "We stayed friends."

Other advertisers ignored threats of vandalism and firebombing. When two men reported that they had been asked to kill Atkins, a Greenville-based business loaned him a radio hooked into its own system and monitored twenty-four hours a day, so that he could call for help with the assurance that the call would be answered. Now, Atkins says that he was more mad than scared during that period.

Community news itself often affords colorful headlines: recently there have been cars stolen and pushed off cliffs; tourists falling off cliffs; kidnapping, rape, and murders. In addition, each issue usually carries some bit of useful if localized information. Mrs. Homer Ledbetter is pictured hoisting two giant snapping turtles destined for the pot; Mr. Ledbetter is shown cutting the head off one; and the luckless head itself is pictured hanging determinably to a stick. There is even some sufficiently vague Foxfire/Cabbagetown advice on how to cook the turtles. There are tall tales by local tellers, and original cartoons.

During the sheriff controversy, one cartoon pictured a building labeled "Law Enforcement Center." From inside, two voices are saying,

"Sheriff, did you want anybody killed today?"

"No, I don't think so. Everytime I ask somebody to do one, they have to run to the newspaper. It's really bad when you can't find someone who can keep a secret."

For what must have seemed like an unconscionably long time to him, Atkins was alone in his charges that all was not kosher in the sheriff's department. His implications that payoffs, theivery, and other criminal offenses were being committed, and that his own life was being threatened for saying so, did not gain much serious interest from area media or the public outside the Slater-Marietta area. During this period Atkins and a few other mavericks were doing their own investigating, salting away documentation for the charges, and staying on top of secret developments through contacts.

Though one former deputy received a ten year sentence for breaking and entering and official misconduct in 1975, no other indictments had been made when a special SLED team was appointed to the probe in June of '76. Atkins had filed a suit in federal court charging that Williams had tried to hire men to kill him (Atkins eventually filed another suit on the same matter; both were dismissed on technicalities by U.S. District Judges Chapman and Hemphill), and Williams had admitted loaning a gun to one of the men. Multimedia papers began carrying the story, some of the articles copyrighted and some delegated to Wire Service, and rumor of pending grand jury indictments became rampant.

But the straw that broke tha camel's back, as far as public interest was concerned was the discovery by The Monitor that a large-scale gambling house was operating on Wade Hampton Boulevard near downtown Greenville, complete with electrified fence, shotgun-armed guards and guard dogs--virtually under the sheriff's nose. It was an election year, and the public would have no more of that, once it had seen proof of the activity on Multimedia's WFBC television news.

Though it would seem that writing, printing, and distributing the Monitor is a full-time job, Larry Atkins manages to devote some 40% of his time to mission work, which includes editing and publishing the Eagle, a monthly missions-oriented newspaper. He has served as president of the Upper Greenville County Ministerial Association, and helped to form seven churches and three orphanages in Haiti.

Though his family and some six part-time helpers assist in getting out The Monitor, when it's printing time Atkins is there in his apron, working with the offset or in the darkroom. He taught himself photography, then, later, developing, when he needed some film one evening after the developing houses had all closed up for the night. "I got directions and a list of what I'd need from a friend, then went to K-Mart and bought it," he remembers. Next day The Monitor printed the finished photos.

Atkins thinks that more people should be following his example--that the small community newspaper is not obsolete, and may even be a trend of the future.

"Every community of any size should have its own local paper," he says, eyes shining. One service it can perform, he suggests, is to keep the smaller town councils and governing bodies on their toes. "It makes quite a difference if they know you're liable to report every word and who said it," he grins. His own watch-dog reporting has gotten him thrown out of more than one meeting--most recently, a town council meeting in City View.

> "...Though his city-based foes like to portray Atkins as a know-nothing hillbilly, he is in fact articulate, well-dressed, and mannerly...That his reporting is a moral matter, inciting moral decisions and reactions from others, is something that is obviously much on his mind..."

But not all of The Monitor's coverage is of controversial issues. It's 10" by 14" twelve pages are full of Slater-Marietta community news, as well as items from around the county ("One of the joys of being a small paper", Atkins points out, "is seeing the happiness of local people at having their own stories told"); ads, cartoons, fillers, free-lance features, and a running commentary on False Doctrine. Trick photography has assisted in several front page articles regarding gargantuan corn grown in the area, and when one interested reader sent in a snapshot of a giant egg believed laid by a chicken who ate the corn, The Monitor dutifully printed the photo.

The Monitor is written in provincial English-- "Road Closed--By Who?", and "What Is The Auston Wilkes Homes" being typical of this. An understated sense of humor runs through its pages. One caption under a car accident reads, "Pictured above shows the results of three cars going through a two lane bridge at the same time." An article explaining why no arrests were made in a recent still bust quotes a Deputy Whitlock as saying, "When we entered the woods, we heard someone holler and a whistle blow. They had lookouts, I'm sure." In The Monitor's pages, the powerful Greenville "cliques" are, perhaps deservedly, reduced to the status of "clicks".

The Monitor sells--partly because it serves a community's needs, and partly because Atkins is a master of the "lead-in" headline. At the local eatery, the dailies and The Monitor are stacked side-by-side on the counter. Though the dailies have some impressive headlines, it is The Monitor's front page that stops the customers in mid-stride. Can they resist turning the pages to learn more about TWO MEN WEARING ONLY A MASK SPOTTED IN MARIETTA orHOW TO INSULT AN ENTIRE COMMUNITY or WILL THE MURDERER OF REV. DUCK FINLEY GO FREE? The answer is usually no.

Atkins has words of praise for Focus, Greenville's black newspaper. Concerning a recent bizarre murder atop Greenville's posh Paris Mountain, he pointed out that "Multimedia didn't cover it very well. Focus did though. You got pretty much the whole story there." Of the large dailies, he prefers The Charlotte Observer; "a good paper".

In late 1976, three years after Larry Atkins began his one-man campaign against what he believed was criminal activity in the sheriff's department, six deputies, including four lieutenants and two detectives, were indicted by the county grand jury. To quote The Greenville News and Greenville Piedmont, "The indicted men were accused of offenses ranging from theft and destruction of property to using their public position for personal gain"--all charges issued years before by Larry Atkins and The Monitor. In early 1977, guilty pleas followed. A new sheriff was in office, and Atkins turned his editorial concern to other matters. Ever the gadfly, The Monitor printed a letter from the U.S. Justice Department to a taxpayer who had questioned Multimedia's possible monopolistic holdings. The Monitor followed up the letter with the observation that "Just recently Multimedia traded WFBC TV to California Corp. for a tv station located in California to avoid an investigation by the U.S. Justice Dept." Protesting the purchase of a fleet of new cars for school officials, Atkins ran a front page story on the options on the superintendent's car--some $2096 worth, with the incisive comment, "We hope the rocker panel molding will help Dr. Hall...do a better job."

Soon, The Greenville County Monitor will become a weekly, enabling it to seek additional advertising revenue in the form of legal ads. "Another advantage of a community paper", Atkins adds, is the opportunity for localized businesses to run ads more cheaply than in the larger papers, and with a more practical distribution for their needs." But it's doubtful that Larry Atkins will run short of controversial stories, or that the stated first purpose of The Monitor--to serve the community with coverage of its own news--will change. The most recent issue bears a lengthy article on--you guessed it--a local softball team's tournament win.

In a masterful bit of understatement, state GOP national committeeman Ray Harris said, "the governor's remarks are not going to enhance our position among blacks."

Even that Republican bastion, The State newspaper, gently tut-tutted Edwards in a recent editorial. "Governor Edwards," The State chided, "is certainly entitled to his opinions. But in this case his rather sympathetic comments are not without the taint of bias since he is a guest of the South African government which paid the bills for his trip."

So it will be interesting to see what the governor has to say in defense of his actions upon his return. Whatever he says, the damage is done. The governor has reaffirmed the opinion of many non-Southerners--justified or not--that the South truly is the home of simple-minded racism. And simple-minded politicians.

Duel in the dunes

The current dispute at Cherry Grove Beach over a developer's atempts to level sand dunes for construction of a parking lot is one more event in a long series of disputes between beach developer Phil Permenter and the public--specifically homeowners and citizens of the North Myrtle Beach area.

In conjunction with realtor C.D. Nixon, who at one time owned a large portion of North Myrtle Beach's Cherry Grove section, Permenter has for the past eight to ten years been involved in development projects that have been heavily criticized by environmentalists and--from time to time--challenged by federal authoritics.

Permenter first made headlines back in the early 70s when he began the development of a Cherry Grove subdivision known as Heritage Shores. The subdivision later gained some notoriety due to the involvement of Congressman John Jenrette of North Myrtle Beach, who at one time owned about 45 percent of the Heritage Shores company. Construction plans for heritage Shores called for "channel lot development", a process whereby the developer brings dredges into a tidelands area and excavates channels to form land bridges, i.e. "channel lots," i.e. prime beach real estate. Valuable marshland is destroyed in the process.

In 1974 the U.S. District Attorney's office in Charleston obtained an injunction halting another Permenter channel development project similar to Heritage Shores. At the time Permenter told a reporter that he didn't have any immediate plans for the property. "I'm just making the land now before they pass laws stopping this kind of work for good,"he said.

For many years, Cherry Grove homeowners, many of whom live elsewhere and use their property for vacationing and rental purposes, tolerated the destruction of the huge marsh which lies behind the Cherry Grove Peninsula. many of the homeowners, in fact, held property that had been "resurrected" from the marsh in the late 50s and early 60s. But as the marsh continued to shrink from the impact of developers, homeowners became disturbed. Finally, in 1974, they joined together to form the North Myrtle Beach Environmental Association and were instrumental in halting some of Permenter's activities.

The current dispute is not over channel development but destruction of beach dunes along the Cherry Grove shoreline. Permenter, acting he says under an oral agreement with C.D. Nixon, began leveling the dunes August 8. Protestors, many of whom are members of a recently-formed organization, Home Owners for the Protection of the Environment (HOPE), rushed to the site. Several women placed themselves in front of a bull dozer, and the dunes-leveling was temporarily halted after it was learned that Permenter did not have city permits necessary to do grading work. Permenter secured a permit the same day (reportedly from an office headed by the husband of a woman claiming title to the land being leveled) but before the grading was resumed, state attorney general Dan McLeod intervened and obtained a temporary restraining order halting the work. A hearing was held before circuit court judge George F. Coleman on August 13 and Coleman extended the restraining order, according to attorneys for HOPE, "until we can have a full-blown trial on the thing."

Columbia attorney and state house of representatives member Jean Toal is representing HOPE in the Cherry Grove dispute. Toal told Osceola this week that McLeod was persuaded to intervene in the matter on the same basis that he sought to enjoin Isle of Palms developer J.C. Long several years ago. Long was also involved in a dunes-leveling operation. Toal says the state will attempt to permanently halt the activity "on the theory of public nuisance."

"That theory," Toal explained, "basically involves public safety, health and welfare--the notion that the dunes are a protective barrier against storm surges and this sort of thing."

According to Toal, special circuit judge Frank Sloan ruled in favor of the state in the Isle of Palms case on the matter of dunes destruction. "The decision," Toal says, "held that without regard to who owns the land, you can't do that anymore because it endangers the public health and safety to bulldoze the dunes."

Osceola will publish a more complete account of the Cherry Grove affair and its relationship to recently-passed tidelands legislation in the near future.

COLUMBIA EAST I THEATRE, 7369 Garner's Ferry Road, 776-0350.
